Description: Good morning kids and pup lovers. We wish we could say that this was a new breed, but sadly, it is not.

We have seen a few of these, when they first appeared, several years ago. All of them look pretty much the same.

One has the coat on the back and another with the same coat in the front. We are only amazed that these little guys have survived so long. Mommy found a couple of them in a ditch along the road. We think that their birth mother had to leave them in the ditch in the freezing cold. Vulnerable pups like these often get hurt and many of them end up in rescue groups and shelters. We have never known what happened to their mother. These pups are not friendly to strangers. Probably because they are afraid of being abandoned again. Hope you like their photos. And maybe even a little of the poo that they keep leaving on Mommy's shoes. Mommy is leaving to take a nap so she can make dinner in a few. When Mommy is back Mommy can help you find the previous post about the pups.

novel technique for characterizing the spatial distribution of microparticles in flow. Discogaluminescence (DGL) imaging spectroscopy is a novel technique for imaging solid particles in flow. The technique does not require the use of light scattering, fluorescence or photo-induced emission, or a phosphorescent or luminescent sample. The approach is based on the use of a monochromatic dispersive imaging spectrometer to acquire DGL spectra as a function of camera angle with respect to the flow direction. The DGL signal is correlated with the distance from the flow axis. DGL spectra are acquired with a 300 kHz high frequency (1 kHz or 10 kHz) monochromator, which allows single microparticle detection. The applicability of the technique has been demonstrated on a spherical microparticle (2.5 microm in diameter
